Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: .but was in reality no more than a hasty passion? I do not for a moment aver that the lesson is lost, or that the fruits of it may not in time be precious and sweet-savour'd; but when I think of the wasted strength, the ill-spent forces, the life-long remorse of the noble soul that has been so betrayed, I feel that the experience has most likely been gained too dearly. You will say what has this to do with Kene or with Mr. Carew? Just this, that the one, however noble his ideals may be, has led a restless, wandering, unsatisfied life; whilst the other, by virtue of inheritance, possesses those qualities you would be sure to look for in your husband--self-repose, calm, and the dignity arising from an unassailable social position. Ingaretha made no answer, but sat at her monitor's feet, pale and...
